WELCOME

Learning how to coach intuitively is one thing.

Building a business around that ability is another.

You can become an excellent intuitive coach. You can understand the Axiom framework. You can ask powerful questions, recognise patterns, work confidently with intuition and, where appropriate, integrate tarot into the coaching process.

But none of those things automatically create a coaching practice.

A practice also needs:

- clarity,
- clients,
- an offer,
- a price,
- visibility,
- a way for people to work with you,
- and the confidence to tell people what you do.

That is what this guide is about.

It is not intended to turn you into a marketing expert, or asking you to become a social media influencer.

And it certainly is not suggesting that you need to create an enormous coaching business.

The objective is much simpler.

To help you take what you have learned through Axiom and begin turning it into a professional intuitive coaching practice.

Whether you ultimately want a small part-time practice, a substantial coaching business, a portfolio career combining coaching with other work, or something much larger, the foundations are surprisingly similar.

You need to know:

- what you are offering,
- who it is for,
- why they would want it,
- what you will charge,

- how people will discover you,

and

- what you need to do next.

Over the following pages, we are going to work through each of those questions.

By the end, you should have the beginnings of a practical business plan for your intuitive coaching practice and, importantly, a 90-day action plan for moving it forward.

This Is About More Than Tarot

Axiom creates an important opportunity for practitioners.

You do not have to build a business entirely around giving tarot readings.

Tarot can be a powerful part of intuitive coaching.

It can help:

- open conversations,
- surface perspectives,
- stimulate intuition,
- reveal patterns,
- create reflection,
- and help clients explore situations differently.

But the cards are not the coaching.

The coaching happens through what you do with the material that emerges.

The questions you ask.

The assumptions you explore.

The choices the client identifies.

The actions they decide to take.

And the changes they begin to embody.

This means your business does not necessarily need to be marketed as:

“Tarot readings with coaching.”

You can think more broadly.

You might build a practice around:

- life transition,
- confidence,
- career change,
- relationships,
- purpose,
- decision-making,
- personal development,
- identity,
- business,

or another area in which you have appropriate experience and competence.

Axiom provides the coaching architecture.

Tarot can sit within that architecture where appropriate.

And you can also coach without cards.

That opens a much larger question:

What kind of intuitive coaching practice do you want to build?

HOW TO USE THIS GUIDE

Do not simply read it. Print it if you can.

Write in it.

Make decisions.

Cross things out.

Change your mind.

Return to earlier exercises when something becomes clearer.

You do not need every answer immediately.

Your business will develop through experience.

The objective at this stage is not perfection.

It is clarity followed by action.

Throughout this guide you will see exercises designed to help you make practical decisions about your business.

Complete them.

Because there is a significant difference between thinking:

“I would like to become an intuitive coach.”

and being able to say:

“I know who I want to help, what I am going to offer them, what I will charge and how I intend to find my first clients.”

That is the shift we are going to make.

STEP ONE: DECIDE WHAT YOU ARE BUILDING

Before thinking about websites, social media, logos, business cards or advertising, there is a more important question.

What are you actually trying to build?

This sounds obvious.

But many practitioners never properly answer it.

They begin with: “I want to become a coach.”

Then they create a website.

Set up social media accounts.

Choose colours.

Write a biography.

Post inspirational content.

Perhaps offer a few sessions.

But there is no clear business behind the activity.

You are going to approach this differently.

You are going to begin with the destination.

Your Practice Does Not Need to Look Like Anyone Else's

There is no single definition of a successful intuitive coaching practice.

One practitioner may want to work with six private clients each week alongside another career.

Another may want coaching to become their primary income.

Another may eventually want to:

- run groups,

- teach workshops,
- write books,
- create courses,
- or train other practitioners.

Someone else may want a small, highly personal private practice and nothing more.

All of these can be valid.

The important thing is that you build deliberately.

Do not build somebody else's definition of success.

Build a practice that supports the work and life you want.

Start With Your Life

A useful business plan does not begin with revenue.

It begins with your life.

Ask yourself: How do I actually want to work?

Would you enjoy five coaching sessions in one day?

Perhaps.

Would you prefer two?

Would you like to coach three days each week and use the remaining time for other work?

Would you like evenings and weekends completely free?

Would you like to work online? In person? Both?

Would you eventually like to run groups?

Would you like to write? Teach? Speak? Travel?

Because every business model creates a lifestyle.

If you do not design that lifestyle deliberately, the business will design it for you.

YOUR PRACTICE VISION

Complete the following.

Ideally, I would like to work:

- ☐ Part-time
- ☐ Full-time
- ☐ Alongside another business or career
- ☐ I am not sure yet

I would ideally like to coach:

_____ days each week.

My preferred working days are:

My preferred coaching hours are:

I would prefer to work:

- ☐ Online
- ☐ In person
- ☐ A combination

I am most interested in:

- ☐ One-to-one coaching
- ☐ Group coaching
- ☐ Workshops
- ☐ Courses
- ☐ Retreats

- ☐ Speaking
- ☐ Writing/books
- ☐ A combination

In twelve months, I would like this practice to be:

Do not worry if some answers are uncertain.

You are creating a starting point.

What Does Thriving Mean to You?

The word thriving is subjective.

For one person, thriving might mean earning £20,000 each year from coaching while working two days a week.

For another, it might mean building a £100,000 business.

For another, it might mean having ten excellent clients, financial security and enough time to write.

Do not inherit somebody else's financial target simply because it sounds impressive.

Ask: What would make this practice commercially worthwhile for me?

That question is more useful.

YOUR FINANCIAL STARTING POINT

In the next twelve months, I would like my intuitive coaching practice to generate approximately:

£_____

Do not worry about whether the number is correct.

Write something.

Now divide that by 12.

My approximate monthly revenue target is:

£_____

Already, your ambition is becoming more concrete.

Later, we will use these figures to think about pricing and client numbers.

Your Capacity Matters

Now consider something frequently ignored when people create income goals.

How many clients can you realistically serve?

Suppose you decide you want £5,000 each month.

If you are charging £50 per session, you would need to deliver approximately 100 paid sessions every month before allowing for cancellations, holidays, business expenses or other realities. 25 hours a week, 5 hours a day of in-depth, meaningful client work.

That may not be the practice you imagined.

This is why pricing, capacity and income have to be considered together.

For now, estimate your preferred coaching capacity.

I would ideally like to work with approximately:

_____ private clients each week.

I could comfortably deliver approximately:

_____ coaching sessions each week.

I do not want to exceed:

_____ coaching sessions each week.

A thriving practice should not require you to become exhausted in order for the maths to work.

What Kind of Work Do You Want to Be Known For?

Now we move from the structure of your practice to its purpose.

Imagine somebody recommends you twelve months from now.

They say: “You should speak to _____. They are really good at helping people with _____.”

What would you like the second blank to contain?

Perhaps:

- Career transition.
- Confidence.
- Relationships.
- Business decisions.
- Life after divorce.
- Purpose.
- Identity.
- Midlife change.
- Spiritual development.
- Decision-making.
- Personal transformation.

Or something much more specific.

You do not have to choose your permanent niche today.

But you do need to begin identifying where your strongest work might sit.

THE WORK I WANT TO DO

I am particularly interested in helping people with:

I naturally find myself drawn to conversations about:

People already tend to come to me for help with:

The kinds of transformation I find most meaningful are:

Areas where I have relevant experience, understanding or expertise include:

Now look at your answers.

What patterns appear?

That may be the beginning of your positioning.

Do Not Start With the Tool

This is one of the most important business principles in this guide.

Clients do not necessarily wake up thinking: "I need an Axiom coach."

They may not even wake up thinking: "I need a tarot coach."

They wake up thinking:

- "I cannot keep doing this job."
- "I don't know what direction my life is going in."
- "I keep repeating the same relationship pattern."
- "I know something needs to change, but I don't know what."
- "I have lost confidence in myself."
- "I cannot make this decision."
- "I feel stuck."

That is where your business begins.

With the client's experience.

Not your methodology.

Axiom is how you help facilitate the process.

It is not necessarily why the client begins looking for help.

This distinction will make your marketing significantly stronger.

Tool Versus Transformation

Compare these two propositions.

VERSION ONE: “I offer intuitive tarot coaching using the Axiom methodology.”

That explains something about what you do.

But it tells the client relatively little about why they need it.

Now compare:

VERSION TWO: “I help people who feel stuck at a major crossroads understand what is keeping them there, reconnect with what they really want and move forward with greater clarity and confidence.”

Now the potential client can recognise themselves.

You can then explain that you use a structured intuitive coaching approach, potentially including tarot where appropriate.

The transformation comes first.

The tool comes second.

THE TRANSFORMATION I WANT TO HELP CREATE

Complete:

I want to help people move FROM:

TO:

For example:

FROM: feeling trapped in a career they have outgrown.

TO: understanding what they want next and beginning to make the transition.

Or:

FROM: repeatedly doubting their own decisions.

TO: developing greater self-trust and making decisions with more confidence.

Or:

FROM: knowing something needs to change but remaining stuck.

TO: identifying what is preventing movement and beginning to take meaningful action.

Now write yours.

FROM:

TO:

That is much closer to the foundation of an actual coaching offer.

Your Practice in One Sentence

Now bring the thinking together.

Use this simple structure: I help [WHO] who are struggling with [PROBLEM] move towards [DESIRED CHANGE] through [APPROACH].

For example:

“I help people navigating major life transitions move from uncertainty and overwhelm towards greater clarity, confidence and purposeful action through structured intuitive coaching.”

Or:

“I help women rebuilding their lives after major relationship change reconnect with their identity, strengthen self-trust and create a clearer vision for what comes next.”

Notice something.

Neither example leads with tarot.

That does not mean tarot cannot be used.

It means the business is built around the client's transformation rather than the practitioner's tool.

WRITE YOUR FIRST VERSION

I help:

who are experiencing:

to move towards:

through:

Now combine it.

I help _____

who _____

to _____

through _____.

Read it aloud.

Does it sound like something you would actually say?

If not, simplify it.

Do not try to sound impressive.

Try to be understood.

You Are Not Choosing Forever

Some practitioners become paralysed at this stage because they believe choosing an audience means excluding everyone else forever.

It does not.

You are creating a starting position.

Your first year will teach you.

You may discover:

a different client group responds more strongly,

a particular problem appears repeatedly,

one area of coaching energises you more than another, or your experience becomes valuable in a way you had not anticipated.

Good positioning can evolve.

But you need somewhere to begin.

Being temporarily specific is usually more useful than being permanently vague.

Your First Business Decision

At the end of Step One, I want you to make one decision.

Complete:

For the next 90 days, I am going to explore building an intuitive coaching practice primarily for:

I want to help them with:

The change I want my work to support is:

Do not overthink it.

This is not a lifelong contract.

It is a direction.

And direction gives you something you can begin building.

STEP ONE ACTION CHECKLIST

Before moving on, make sure you have:

- ☐ Defined what you want the practice to contribute financially.
- ☐ Considered how many days and hours you want to work.
- ☐ Estimated your sustainable client capacity.
- ☐ Identified an initial group of people you would like to help.
- ☐ Identified the problem or transition you want to help them navigate.
- ☐ Described the transformation rather than simply the tool.
- ☐ Written a first version of your practice statement.
- ☐ Chosen a direction for the next 90 days.

If you have done those things, you already know more about the business you are building than many practitioners know after months of creating websites and social media content.

And we can now answer the next question:

Who exactly is the person you want to serve, and what would make them actively seek your help?

That is where Step Two begins.

STEP TWO: DEFINE YOUR IDEAL CLIENT

You now have the beginnings of a practice.

You have considered what you want to build, how you want to work and the type of transformation you may want to help create.

The next question is: Who is most likely to want that transformation badly enough to seek help with it?

This is where many practitioners make one of two mistakes.

The first is trying to help everyone.

The second is creating an imaginary "ideal client" in so much detail that the exercise becomes meaningless.

You probably do not need to know:

- what car they drive,
- what magazines they read,
- what they eat for breakfast,
- or whether they prefer coffee to tea.

You need to understand something far more important.

What is happening in their life?

What are they struggling with?

What do they want?

Why haven't they solved it already?

And what might cause them to seek support now?

That is the client understanding we need.

Start With the Problem, Not the Person

Suppose you decide your ideal client is: "Women aged 40–55 interested in spirituality and personal development."

That tells you something.

But commercially, it does not tell you very much.

Now consider:

“Women in midlife who have reached a point where the life they have built no longer feels like the life they want, but who are uncertain about what needs to change or what should come next.”

That is different.

We can begin to understand the conversation.

The person might be thinking:

“Is this really it?”

“I've spent years looking after everyone else. I don't know what I want anymore.”

“Something has changed in me.”

“I should be grateful, so why am I unhappy?”

“I know I can't continue like this.”

“I don't know who I am anymore.”

Now you have material you can coach around.

You also have language you can market around.

What Is Happening When They Find You?

People rarely buy coaching because everything is going perfectly.

Something usually creates movement.

- A problem.
- A frustration.
- A transition.
- A decision.
- An ambition.
- A loss of confidence.
- A repeated pattern.
- A sense that something needs to change.

Your job is to understand the moment before the enquiry.

Ask: What has happened in this person's life that makes them start looking for someone like me?

That question is enormously valuable.

THE MOMENT OF NEED

Complete the following for the person you identified in Step One.

What is happening in their life?

What are they struggling with?

What decision, change or challenge might they be facing?

Why might this matter particularly now?

What might happen if nothing changes?

You are beginning to move from a demographic description to a human problem.

Listen to the Words They Would Actually Use

Your potential client may not describe their situation using coaching terminology.

They may not say: "I am experiencing a limiting belief around identity."

They might say: “I don't think I'm good enough.”

They may not say: “I require support with values alignment.”

They might say: “My life looks fine, but it doesn't feel like me anymore.”

They may not say: “I am experiencing resistance to behavioural activation.”

They might say: “I know what I should do. I just can't seem to make myself do it.”

Good marketing frequently begins with learning to speak in the client's language rather than the practitioner's.

THEIR WORDS

Imagine your ideal client sitting opposite you.

Complete these sentences as they might say them.

“The problem is...”

“I'm tired of...”

“I keep...”

“I wish I could...”

“I'm worried that...”

“What I really want is...”

“If I could just...”

Read the answers.

These sentences may eventually become more useful to your marketing than a page of clever copy.

Understand What They Want

Clients do not only buy because they have a problem.

They buy because they want something on the other side of it.

Perhaps they want:

- clarity,
- confidence,
- direction,
- change,
- freedom,
- better relationships,
- a new career,
- greater self-trust,
- a successful business,
- stronger boundaries,
- or a renewed sense of purpose.

But try to go deeper.

If someone says: “I want confidence.”

Ask: Confidence to do what?

If they say: “I want clarity.”

Ask: Clarity about what?

If they say: “I want change.”

Ask: What would actually be different?

Specific outcomes create stronger offers.

WHAT DO THEY WANT INSTEAD?

My client currently feels:

They want to feel:

They are currently doing:

They would like to be doing:

They are currently tolerating:

They would like to change:

If our work were successful, their life might look different because:

This begins defining the transformation your offer may support.

Do Not Promise What You Cannot Control

There is an important distinction.

You can help someone:

- explore,
- understand,
- clarify,
- develop,
- decide,

- plan,
- and take action.

You cannot guarantee that:

- they will find their soulmate,
- receive a promotion,
- save their relationship,
- double their business,
- become wealthy,
- or experience a particular external result.

Your offer should be compelling.

But it should also be credible.

For example: “I help people navigate career transition with greater clarity and confidence.”

is different from: “I guarantee you will find your dream career.”

The first describes the work.

The second promises an outcome you cannot completely control.

Strong marketing does not require exaggerated claims.

Understand What Has Kept Them Stuck

If solving the problem were easy, your client might already have solved it.

Something is preventing movement.

Perhaps:

- they do not know what they want,
- they have too many options,
- they fear making the wrong decision,
- they lack confidence,
- they repeatedly seek reassurance,
- they understand the problem intellectually but do not act,
- they prioritise everyone else,
- they are frightened of the consequences of change,
- or they simply do not know where to begin.

This is particularly relevant to Axiom.

The client may already have insight.

What they do not yet have is movement.

That creates a different coaching proposition.

You are not simply helping them understand what is happening.

You are helping them explore what needs to happen next.

WHAT IS KEEPING THEM STUCK?

They probably already know:

But they are struggling to:

The fear underneath this may be:

The pattern they may be repeating is:

The decision they may be avoiding is:

The support they may need is:

This information will become important when we design your coaching offer.

Who Is Ready for Coaching?

Not everybody experiencing a problem is necessarily ready to become your client.

A strong-fit coaching client is usually willing to participate in the process.

They may not have the answers.

They may be uncertain.

They may be frightened.

They may feel stuck.

But there is some willingness to explore and engage.

A client who wants you to make every decision for them is asking for something different.

A client who wants certainty about the future may be seeking a traditional predictive reading rather than coaching.

A client who expects you to change another person is unlikely to be ready for transformational work.

Axiom is collaborative.

The practitioner facilitates.

The client participates.

That distinction should influence who you choose to work with.

YOUR BEST - FIT CLIENT

My strongest-fit client is someone who:

- ☐ Is open to reflection.
- ☐ Wants something to change.
- ☐ Is willing to explore their own role in the situation.
- ☐ Understands that coaching is collaborative.
- ☐ Is prepared to make their own decisions.
- ☐ Is willing to take appropriate action.

Add your own criteria:

☐ _____

☐ _____

☐ _____

Who Might Not Be a Good Fit?

This is equally useful.

You do not need every enquiry to become a client.

Someone may not be a good fit because:

they want a service you do not provide,

they expect guaranteed predictions,

they want you to make major life decisions for them, their needs fall outside your competence or professional scope, they are unwilling to engage with the coaching process, or another type of professional support would be more appropriate.

Being willing to say:

“I don't think I am the right person to help you with this.”

is part of professional practice.

A successful business is not built by saying yes to everyone.

It is built by becoming increasingly clear about where you create genuine value.

Your Client Does Not Have to Be You

There is a temptation in coaching businesses to create an ideal client who looks exactly like the practitioner five years ago.

Sometimes that works.

Your experience may provide genuine insight and empathy.

But be careful.

Your client's journey is not automatically your journey.

They may make different decisions.

Want different things.

Hold different values.

Respond differently.

Your experience can inform your work.

It should not dictate the client's destination.

Create a Simple Client Profile

Now bring everything together.

Do not write three pages.

Complete this one-page profile.

MY IDEAL CLIENT

They are:

They are currently experiencing:

The biggest problem they want help with is:

They are frustrated because:

They have probably already tried:

What is keeping them stuck is:

What they really want is:

They are likely to seek help when:

They would be a strong fit for my coaching because:

They might not be a good fit if:

This is enough.

You now have somebody to build the offer around.

STEP TWO ACTION CHECKLIST

Before moving on:

- ☐ I can describe what is happening in my client's life.
- ☐ I understand the problem they are trying to solve.
- ☐ I have identified what they want instead.
- ☐ I have written some of the language they might actually use.
- ☐ I understand some of the reasons they remain stuck.
- ☐ I have considered what makes someone a strong-fit coaching client.
- ☐ I understand that my service should be built around the client's transformation rather than the cards.

Now we can build something for them to buy.

STEP THREE: CREATE YOUR SIGNATURE COACHING OFFER

This is where your practice starts becoming a business.

You have identified:

who you want to help, what they are struggling with, and what they want to change.

Now you need to answer: What exactly can they buy from you?

Many practitioners begin with the simplest possible answer:

“A one-hour session.”

There is nothing inherently wrong with individual sessions.

But if your objective is transformational coaching, there is a limitation.

Transformation rarely fits neatly into sixty minutes.

A client may gain insight in one session.

But Axiom itself recognises a crucial distinction:

Insight is not transformation.

Something has to happen afterwards.

The client needs to:

- reflect,
- decide,
- experiment,
- act,
- calibrate,
- integrate,
- and potentially return to the work.

That is why a structured coaching journey can be more appropriate than a collection of disconnected sessions.

Stop Selling Time

Consider the difference.

OPTION ONE

Intuitive Coaching Session

60 minutes

£75

OPTION TWO

Career Crossroads Coaching Programme

A structured eight-week intuitive coaching journey for people who know their current career is no longer right but are uncertain about what comes next.

Includes:

- four private coaching sessions,
- structured reflection between sessions,
- a personalised action plan,
- and appropriate use of intuitive tools throughout the process.

£495

The second offer is easier to understand as a transformation.

The client is not simply buying four hours.

They are buying a structured journey through a problem that matters to them.

Your Offer Needs a Purpose

Begin by completing one sentence:

This programme exists to help _____.

For example:

“This programme exists to help people at a career crossroads understand what they really want and begin making a confident transition.”

Or:

“This programme exists to help people recovering from major life change rebuild confidence, reconnect with themselves and create direction for what comes next.”

Now write yours:

This programme exists to help:

If you cannot explain the purpose simply, the offer is not yet clear enough.

Give the Journey a Beginning and an End

A programme needs boundaries.

It does not need to solve someone's entire life.

It needs to help them move from a recognisable starting point towards a meaningful outcome.

Ask:

Where is the client when they begin?

What do we need to explore?

What might need to change?

What would meaningful progress look like?

Where should the client ideally be when the programme concludes?

You are beginning to create the journey.

How Long Should It Be?

There is no perfect programme length.

You might create:

a four-session programme,

six sessions over three months,

an intensive half-day plus follow-up,

an eight-week journey,

or another structure appropriate to the work.

Do not make it longer simply to justify a higher price.

And do not make it too short because you are frightened of asking someone to commit.

Ask:

What structure gives this client a realistic opportunity to create meaningful movement?

For many transformational coaching offers, time between sessions matters.

The client needs opportunities to live the work.

That is where:

Action, resistance, experimentation, and real-world learning appear.

DESIGN YOUR PROGRAMME

Programme name:

Who is it for?

What problem does it address?

What outcome does it support?

Programme duration:

_____ weeks/months.

Number of private sessions:

Session length:

Frequency:

Between-session support, if any:

Resources included:

Programme price:

£_____

We will examine the price in Step Four.

Where Does Axiom Fit?

Axiom can provide the architecture beneath the coaching journey.

You may work through:

Awareness

What is actually happening?

Activation

What needs to move?

Calibration

What needs adjusting?

Expansion

What becomes possible?

Embodiment

How does insight become lived behaviour?

Identity

Who is the client becoming through the process?

But be careful.

You are not necessarily selling six stages.

The client does not need to buy:

“Awareness, Activation, Calibration, Expansion, Embodiment and Identity.”

They need to understand what those stages help them achieve.

Axiom is the architecture behind the experience.

The offer is the transformation the client can recognise.

Where Does Tarot Fit?

You also need to decide how tarot sits within the offer.

There are several possibilities.

TAROT-LED

Tarot is a prominent part of the experience and is clearly communicated in the offer.

TAROT-INTEGRATED

Tarot is one of several intuitive/coaching tools and is introduced where useful.

TAROT-OPTIONAL

The client can work with tarot where appropriate, but the programme does not depend upon it.

NON-TAROT

You use the Axiom coaching framework without cards.

This flexibility is important.

Axiom allows you to think beyond:

“I am a tarot reader who has added coaching.”

You can become:

“An intuitive coach with a structured methodology who may use tarot as one of the tools within the process.”

That is a significant professional shift.

CHOOSE YOUR APPROACH

For this offer, tarot will be:

- ☐ Tarot-led
- ☐ Tarot-integrated
- ☐ Tarot-optional
- ☐ Not used

The reason I have chosen this is:

Tarot will add value by:

I will avoid using tarot simply because:

The cards should serve the coaching.

The coaching should not be forced to serve the cards.

What Happens Between Sessions?

This is where a coaching programme becomes more than a sequence of conversations.

Depending on your approach, clients might:

- journal,
- complete an exercise,
- observe a behaviour,
- practise a boundary,
- have a conversation,
- take a practical step,
- test a new approach,
- or reflect on a question.

Do not create homework simply to make the programme look substantial.

Ask: What would help the client turn what happened in the session into something meaningful in their life?

That is the purpose of between-session work.

BETWEEN-SESSION INTEGRATION

My clients may be invited to:

- ☐ Journal or reflect.
- ☐ Complete a practical exercise.
- ☐ Take an agreed action.
- ☐ Observe a pattern.
- ☐ Practise a new behaviour.
- ☐ Have a specific conversation.
- ☐ Review progress before the next session.
- ☐ Other: _____

The purpose of this activity is:

Do Not Overfill the Offer

New practitioners often believe value means more.

More sessions.

More worksheets.

More bonuses.

More voice notes.

More access.

More PDFs.

More calls.

But clients do not necessarily need more material.

They need the right support.

A clear, focused programme can be more valuable than an enormous package full of things the client never uses.

Ask: What genuinely contributes to the transformation?

Include that.

Remove unnecessary clutter.

Name the Programme Around the Client

Your programme name does not have to be clever.

Clarity usually wins.

Compare:

The Celestial Phoenix Quantum Alignment Journey with:

Career Crossroads

The second immediately suggests what the programme might address.

You might use:

Confident Next Chapter

Life After Change

The Career Reset

Relationship Patterns

Purpose & Direction

Intuitive Business Clarity

These are only examples.

The important question is:

Can the right person recognise that this might be for them?

YOUR OFFER IN ONE PARAGRAPH

Complete:

[PROGRAMME NAME] is a [DURATION] intuitive coaching programme for [CLIENT] who are [PROBLEM/SITUATION]. Through structured coaching using the Axiom framework [and tarot where appropriate], we explore [KEY AREAS] so that you can move towards [DESIRED OUTCOME].

Write your version:

Now simplify it.

Then read it aloud.

Would a potential client understand:

who it is for?

why they might want it?

what happens?

what they are moving towards?

If yes, you have the foundations of a sellable offer.

THE ONE-OFFER CHALLENGE

For the first 90 days, I strongly recommend beginning with one primary coaching offer.

Not:

private readings and three coaching packages and two memberships and a course and four workshops and six different session types.

One clear offer gives you something to test.

You can learn whether people understand it, whether they want it, whether the price works, whether the structure works, and whether you enjoy delivering it. Then improve.

Complexity can come later.

MY 90-DAY OFFER

For the next 90 days, my primary offer will be:

It is for:

It helps them with:

It lasts:

It includes:

The result I want the client to move towards is:

The next thing I need to do to make this offer real is:

STEP THREE ACTION CHECKLIST

Before moving on:

☐ I have chosen one primary coaching offer.

☐ I can explain who it is for.

- ☐ I can explain the problem it addresses.
- ☐ I have defined the transformation it supports.
- ☐ I have decided the programme duration.
- ☐ I have decided how many sessions it includes.
- ☐ I have considered between-session integration.
- ☐ I know how Axiom sits behind the coaching journey.
- ☐ I have decided whether tarot is led, integrated, optional or absent.
- ☐ I can describe the offer in one paragraph.

You now have something that can become a real product.

But there is one question many practitioners find uncomfortable:

What should you charge for it?

That is where we go next.

STEP FOUR: PRICE IT PROPERLY

Pricing can become surprisingly emotional.

Practitioners ask: “What am I worth?”

That is usually the wrong question.

You are not putting a price on yourself.

You are pricing a professional service.

A service has:

- a structure,
- a market,
- a client outcome,
- a delivery cost,
- a time requirement,
- and a place within a business model.

So rather than asking: “What am I worth?”

Ask: “What does this service need to cost for the practice to be sustainable?”

That is a much healthier business question.

Start With the Numbers

Return to the annual revenue target you created in Step One.

My desired annual coaching revenue:

£_____

Now consider how many programme clients you can realistically serve in a year.

Do not assume 52 working weeks.

Allow for:

Holidays, illness, training, administration, marketing, business development, and ordinary life.

My realistic number of programme clients each year:

Now divide your desired annual coaching revenue by your realistic annual client capacity.

Revenue target:

£_____

÷

Number of clients:

=

Average client value required:

£_____

This is not automatically the price you should charge.

But it gives you important information.

A Simple Example

Suppose you want your coaching programmes to generate:

£36,000 each year, before taxes.

You estimate that you can comfortably work with:

60 programme clients annually.

£36,000 ÷ 60 = £600

Your average client needs to generate approximately £600 in revenue.

If your programme is currently priced at £200, something does not work.

You either need:

many more clients,

a different offer mix,

a different revenue target,

or a different price.

This is why pricing cannot be separated from capacity.

Calculate the Delivery

Now look at the programme itself.

Suppose it contains:

four 75-minute sessions.

That is five hours of direct delivery.

But also consider:

- preparation,
- administration,
- client communication,
- payment processing,
- resources,
- follow-up,
- and other delivery time.

Your programme may require seven hours of your business time rather than five.

If you charge £280, your gross revenue per business hour is approximately £40 before expenses and tax.

Again, this does not tell you what you must charge.

It tells you what your current model actually means.

And good business decisions begin with knowing the numbers.

YOUR PROGRAMME NUMBERS

Programme price:

£_____

Direct coaching hours:

Approximate additional delivery/admin hours:

Total approximate business hours:

Approximate gross revenue per hour:

£ _____

Does this feel commercially sustainable?

☐ Yes

☐ No

☐ Unsure

What might need adjusting?

Do Not Price From Fear

Fear can produce prices that have little relationship to the business.

You think: "Nobody will pay £500."

So you charge £150.

But you have no evidence that nobody will pay £500.

You have simply made the decision on their behalf.

Equally, do not charge an inflated price simply because somebody online tells you that "high-ticket coaching" is the answer.

Price needs to make sense for:

- your market,
- your experience,
- your offer,
- your positioning,
- your costs,
- and the practice you are building.

Use evidence rather than bravado.

Your Price Will Evolve

Your first price does not need to be your permanent price.

As you:

- gain experience,
- improve the programme,
- develop stronger evidence,
- increase demand,
- refine the client experience,
- and approach capacity,

you can review it.

The objective is not to discover the magical perfect number before you begin.

The objective is to choose a credible, sustainable starting price and test it in the real world.

YOUR STARTING PRICE

For the next 90 days, my programme price will be:

£_____

I have chosen this because:

I will review this price after:

☐ 5 clients

☐ 10 clients

☐ 90 days

☐ Other: _____

The evidence I will consider when reviewing it is:

That is enough for now.

You have:

a client,

a problem,

an offer,

and a price.

The next challenge is making all of that understandable.

Because if someone cannot quickly understand what you do, it becomes much harder for them to decide whether they need you.

That brings us to Step Five:

How do you explain your intuitive coaching practice simply, confidently and without disappearing into jargon?

STEP FIVE: EXPLAIN WHAT YOU DO

You can have an excellent offer and still struggle to attract clients if people do not understand it.

This is especially common in intuitive coaching.

Practitioners often describe their work using language such as:

- intuition,
- energy,
- alignment,
- transformation,
- empowerment,
- spiritual growth,
- coaching,
- tarot,
- Axiom,
- self-development,
- and personal change.

All of those words may be meaningful.

But when they appear together, the client can be left wondering:

“What do you actually help people with?”

Clarity matters.

You do not need to explain your entire methodology in the first conversation.

You need to make it easy for the right person to recognise:

who you help,

what you help with,

and

why they might want to know more.

Start With the Client, Not Your Credentials

Imagine somebody asks: “What do you do?”

Many practitioners immediately reply: “I’m an intuitive coach, tarot practitioner and certified Axiom practitioner. I use intuition and transformational coaching techniques to empower clients...”

This tells the person a lot about you.

It tells them relatively little about why they might need you.

Try starting with the client instead.

For example: “I work with people who have reached a major crossroads and know something needs to change, but they are struggling to work out what comes next.”

Now the listener can recognise the problem.

Then you can add: “I use a structured intuitive coaching approach called Axiom, and I can integrate tarot where it adds value to the process.”

Problem first.

Method second.

That sequence is easier to understand.

The Three Levels of Your Message

You need three versions of your message.

1. THE 10-SECOND VERSION

For casual conversations.

2. THE 30-SECOND VERSION

When someone shows interest.

3. THE WEBSITE VERSION

Where you have more space to explain.

Let's create each one.

Your 10-Second Version

Use: I help [WHO] with [PROBLEM] so they can [DESIRED CHANGE].

Example: "I help people at a career crossroads work out what they really want next and begin moving towards it with greater confidence."

Another example: "I help intuitive practitioners who feel stuck building their businesses create clearer offers, stronger positioning and a practical route to finding clients."

Short.

Specific.

Easy to remember.

WRITE YOUR 10-SECOND VERSION

I help _____

who are struggling with _____ so they can _____.

Now read it aloud.

Could somebody repeat it accurately ten minutes later?

If not, simplify it.

Your 30-Second Version

Now add your approach.

Use:

I help [WHO] who are experiencing [PROBLEM] move towards [OUTCOME]. I use a structured intuitive coaching approach called Axiom, which helps move the work from insight into practical change. Tarot can be integrated where it is useful, but the focus is always on the client's transformation rather than simply giving a reading.

Adapt it to your practice.

WRITE YOUR 30-SECOND VERSION

Now remove any word that sounds impressive but adds little meaning.

Clear communication is usually stronger than elaborate language.

Your Website Version

On your website, you can explain more.

A simple structure is:

THE PROBLEM

Show that you understand what the client is experiencing.

THE POSSIBILITY

Describe what they want to move towards.

YOUR APPROACH

Explain how you work.

THE OFFER

Show what they can buy.

THE NEXT STEP

Tell them what to do.

A SIMPLE WEBSITE OPENING

For example:

You know something needs to change. The difficulty is working out what.

You may be facing a major decision, questioning the direction your life has taken or repeatedly finding yourself stuck between what feels safe and what you actually want.

I provide structured intuitive coaching designed to help you understand what is really happening, explore what is keeping you stuck and begin moving towards clearer, more intentional action.

I work using the Axiom framework, with tarot available as a reflective tool where appropriate.

If you are ready to explore what comes next, you can learn more about my coaching programme below.

Notice what happens.

The client is at the centre.

Axiom supports the explanation.

Tarot is positioned appropriately.

The transformation remains primary.

Avoid Practitioner Language

Some words are meaningful inside training but less useful in marketing.

For example:

Calibration

may be important within Axiom.

But the client may respond more readily to:

“Understanding what is keeping you stuck and what needs adjusting.”

Likewise:

Embodiment

may become:

“Turning insight into something you actually begin doing differently.”

Your internal professional language and your external client language do not always need to be identical.

Translate the method into the client's world.

AVOID THE JARGON TEST

Look at your current description.

Circle any words such as:

- alignment,
- activation,
- embodiment,
- empowerment,
- transformation,
- energy,
- intuition,
- limiting beliefs,
- breakthrough,
- purpose,
- authentic,
- or spiritual.

Now ask:

Would my ideal client naturally use this word to describe their problem?

If yes, keep it.

If no, consider translating it into simpler language.

Do Not Hide the Offer

Some practitioners talk extensively about:

their philosophy,

their story,

their training,

their beliefs,

and their methods

but never clearly say:

“Here is how you can work with me.”

Your marketing should eventually lead somewhere.

If someone is interested, they should be able to find:

the offer,

the price or pricing process,

what happens,

and how to enquire.

Make the next step obvious.

YOUR NEXT-STEP SENTENCE

Complete:

If you are currently _____ and would like support with _____, the next step is _____.

For example:

“If you are currently facing an important career decision and would like structured support exploring what comes next, the next step is to book an introductory consultation.”

Write yours:

Your Message Should Be Repeatable

People recommend businesses they can explain.

Imagine a client speaking to a friend.

You want them to be able to say something like:

“She helps people who are stuck in major life decisions work out what they really want and actually start doing something about it.”

That is referrable.

Compare:

“She does intuitive transformational Axiom-based coaching using tarot and personal development techniques.”

That is harder to repeat.

The simpler your message becomes, the easier other people can carry it for you.

YOUR REFERRAL SENTENCE

Complete:

If you know someone who _____, they may find my work useful because _____.

Now shorten it.

STEP FIVE ACTION CHECKLIST

Before moving on:

- ☐ I have a 10-second explanation of what I do.
- ☐ I have a 30-second explanation.
- ☐ My message starts with the client's problem rather than my methodology.
- ☐ I can explain Axiom simply.
- ☐ I can explain the role of tarot without making tarot the entire offer.
- ☐ I have removed unnecessary jargon.
- ☐ I have a clear next step for interested people.
- ☐ My service is easy to refer.

You now have something to say.

The next challenge is making sure enough of the right people hear it.

STEP SIX: FIND YOUR FIRST CLIENTS

You do not need thousands of followers.

You do not need a huge advertising budget.

You do not need to become an influencer.

You need enough of the right people to discover that:

you exist,

you understand a problem they care about,

and you have a service that may help.

That is marketing.

At its simplest:

Marketing is making the right people aware of useful work.

There are many ways to do this.

But when you are beginning, complexity is the enemy.

I recommend four primary routes.

PEOPLE

PARTNERSHIPS

CONTENT

EXPERIENCES

You do not need to master all four immediately.

Choose two to prioritise.

Your first clients may already be closer than you think.

Consider:

previous tarot clients, people who have attended your workshops,
professional contacts,
friends of clients,
existing email subscribers,
people who already follow your work, and people who have previously asked about coaching.

This does not mean sending everyone you know an aggressive sales message.

It means telling appropriate people clearly that your work has developed.

For example:

“I have recently developed a structured intuitive coaching programme for people facing major career or life transitions. I am currently opening a small number of places while I build the programme further. If you know someone who you think this may genuinely help, I would be grateful if you passed on the details.”

Clear.

Professional.

No pressure.

ROUTE ONE - PEOPLE

WHO ALREADY KNOWS ME?

List ten people, groups or existing audiences who already know something about your work.

1. _____
2. _____
3. _____
4. _____
5. _____

6. _____
7. _____
8. _____
9. _____
10. _____

Now circle the three most relevant.

Those may be your easiest starting points.

ROUTE TWO - PARTNERSHIPS

Ask: Who already knows the people I want to help?

For example, if you work with career transition, potential partners might include:

- career coaches,
- recruiters,
- business networks,
- wellbeing organisations,
- professional groups,
- or training providers.

If you work with intuitive practitioners, potential partners might include:

- tarot schools,
- spiritual communities,
- coaching groups,
- event organisers,
- or complementary practitioners.

The goal is not: “Please promote me.”

The stronger question is: “What could I contribute to your audience?”

Perhaps:

a guest workshop, an article, a discussion, an interview, a short masterclass, or a collaborative event.

Partnerships work best when everyone benefits.

YOUR PARTNERSHIP MAP

Five people or organisations whose audience overlaps with mine:

1. _____
2. _____
3. _____
4. _____
5. _____

Something useful I could contribute:

The first person I will contact is:

I will contact them by:

ROUTE THREE - CONTENT

Content allows people to experience your thinking before they experience your coaching.

But do not fall into the trap of creating endless generic posts.

You do not need:

“Three ways to be happier.”

“Five signs you need a change.”

“Today's inspirational tarot message.”

Those may generate engagement.

They do not necessarily build authority.

Instead, teach around the problem you help solve.

If you specialise in decision-making, you could write about:

why more information does not always create clarity,
why people repeatedly ask others what they should do,
the difference between intuition and fear, or why delaying a decision can become a decision in itself.
Now your content demonstrates how you think.
That creates trust.

THE FOUR CONTENT QUESTIONS

Every week, choose one client problem and create content around four angles.

1. WHAT IS HAPPENING?

Describe the problem.

2. WHAT DO PEOPLE MISUNDERSTAND?

Create a distinction.

3. WHAT DO I BELIEVE?

Share your perspective.

4. WHAT COULD THEY DO NEXT?

Offer a useful question or action.

One problem can generate several pieces of content.

CONTENT IDEAS

Five problems my client experiences:

1. _____
2. _____
3. _____
4. _____

5. _____

One belief or perspective I have about each:

1. _____

2. _____

3. _____

4. _____

5. _____

You now have at least five meaningful content ideas.

ROUTE FOUR - EXPERIENCES

For intuitive coaches, experiences can be particularly powerful.

People may find it difficult to understand your work from a website alone.

- A workshop allows them to experience:
- your teaching,
- your questions,
- your methodology,
- your style,
- and your thinking.

That can accelerate trust.

Your workshop does not need to be huge.

Ten relevant people in a room can be extremely valuable.

Your Signature Workshop

Create one introductory workshop connected directly to your coaching offer.

For example:

Coaching Offer: Career Crossroads

Workshop: Why You Still Cannot Decide What Comes Next in Your Career

Or:

Coaching Offer: Confident Practitioner

Workshop; Why Being Good at Tarot Is Not Enough to Build a Coaching Practice

The workshop introduces the problem.

The coaching programme supports the deeper transformation.

That creates a natural relationship between the two.

BUILD YOUR WORKSHOP

Workshop title:

It is for:

The main problem it addresses is:

Participants will leave understanding:

1.

2.

3.

At the end, I will invite suitable participants to:

Choose Only Two Routes

At the beginning, do not try to do everything.

Choose two.

For example:

Content + workshops

or:

Partnerships + email

or:

Existing contacts + speaking

Your job is to become consistent before becoming complicated.

MY TWO CLIENT ROUTES

PRIMARY ROUTE

The action I will take every week:

SECONDARY ROUTE

The action I will take every week:

That is your first marketing system.

You Need to Invite People

This may sound obvious.

But many practitioners do everything except make the offer.

They:

post,

teach, write,

help, share,

answer questions,

and inspire.

But they rarely say: “I have a coaching programme for this.”

Your audience cannot read your mind.

You are allowed to sell.

A simple invitation might be:

“If this is something you are currently struggling with, I work with clients on exactly this inside my Career Crossroads programme. You can find the details here.”

That is enough.

No pressure.

No manipulation.

Just clarity.

THE WEEKLY INVITATION

Complete:

If you are currently _____ and want support moving towards _____, I offer _____.
The next step is _____.

Use this regularly.

Track Where People Come From

Every time someone enquires, ask:

“How did you first hear about me?”

Record it.

Over time you may discover:

workshops generate the strongest clients, or referrals,

or Facebook,

or your email list,

or partnerships.

Then do more of what works.

Do not guess forever.

Collect evidence.

STEP SIX ACTION CHECKLIST

- ☐ I understand that I do not need a huge audience.
- ☐ I have identified people who already know my work.
- ☐ I have identified potential professional partners.
- ☐ I have created at least five useful content ideas.
- ☐ I have considered a signature workshop.
- ☐ I have chosen two primary client-acquisition routes.
- ☐ I know what action I will take every week.
- ☐ I have written a clear invitation.
- ☐ I will track where enquiries come from.

You now know how people can discover you.

But discovery is not the same as becoming a client.

Eventually somebody says:

“This sounds interesting. Can you tell me more?”

Next, you turn that interest into a client.

STEP SEVEN: TURN INTEREST INTO CLIENTS

Many practitioners dislike selling.

They imagine:

- pressure,
- scripts,
- persuasion,
- objection handling,
- and trying to force someone to say yes.

You do not need to sell that way.

A good coaching sales conversation can be much simpler.

Your job is not to convince everybody.

Your job is to understand:

- what the person needs,
- whether your programme is appropriate,
- and whether they want to proceed.

Think of the conversation as:

UNDERSTAND

EXPLORE

ESTABLISH FIT

EXPLAIN

INVITE

DECIDE

1. UNDERSTAND

Begin with the person.

Ask: “What made you reach out?”

Then listen.

Do not immediately begin explaining Axiom.

Do not list your qualifications.

Do not pitch the programme.

Understand what is happening first.

Useful questions include:

“What is happening at the moment?”

“What feels most difficult?”

“Why has this become important now?”

“How long has this been going on?”

2. EXPLORE

Now understand what they want instead.

Ask:

“What would you like to become different?”

“What would meaningful progress look like?”

“What have you already tried?”

“What tends to stop you?”

These questions help both of you understand the problem more clearly.

3. ESTABLISH FIT

Now ask yourself:

Can I genuinely help?

Is this within my competence?

Does my offer address the problem?

Does the client understand that coaching requires participation?

Are their expectations realistic?

If the answer is no, do not sell harder.

Say so.

Professional confidence includes:

“I don't think I am the right person for this.”

4. EXPLAIN

If your programme fits, explain it in relation to what they have told you.

For example:

“Based on what you've described, I think my Career Crossroads programme could be appropriate. You said the main difficulty is not simply knowing that you want a change. It is working out what you want instead and then having enough confidence to act. That is exactly what the programme is designed around.”

Then explain:

the structure,

duration, method, support, and price.

Keep it relevant.

5. INVITE

Then simply ask:

“Would you like to work together on this?”

You do not need a clever closing technique.

Let them decide.

6. DECIDE

The answer may be:

yes,

no,

or

I need to think.

All are possible.

Do not make the client responsible for protecting your feelings.

They are allowed to say no.

Your job is to communicate the offer clearly.

Their job is to decide whether it is right for them.

THE CONSULTATION STRUCTURE

Use this during your first conversations.

What made you reach out?

What is happening?

What feels most difficult?

What would you like to change?

What have you already tried?

What tends to keep you stuck?

Why does this matter now?

Does my programme fit?

☐ Yes

☐ No

☐ Unsure

If yes, why?

State the Price Calmly

When you reach the investment, say:

“The programme is £_____.”

Then stop.

Do not immediately say:

“But I can discount it.”

Or:

“I know that's expensive.”

Or:

“I'm sorry.”

You are pricing a professional service.

State the price clearly and let the person respond.

If They Say “I Need to Think”

You can say:

“Of course. Is there anything in particular you feel you need to think through?”

Perhaps they need to:

check finances,

speak to someone,

consider timing,

or clarify something about the programme.

Answer genuine questions.

Do not pressure them.

If They Say “I Cannot Afford It”

Respect the boundary.

Do not say:

“You cannot afford not to.”

Do not encourage inappropriate debt.

Do not suggest that financial caution means they lack commitment.

You can simply say:

“I understand.”

If you have a genuinely appropriate lower-cost option, you may mention it.

If not, accept the decision.

If They Say No

A no is information.

It is not automatically evidence that:

your programme is wrong,

your price is wrong, or you are not good enough.

Look for patterns.

One no means one person said no.

Ten similar objections may tell you something useful.

Collect evidence.

FOLLOW-UP

After a consultation, you can send a simple message.

For example:

Thank you for speaking with me today. As promised, I have included the details of the programme below. If you decide it feels right, the next step is [NEXT STEP]. If you have any questions, let me know.

Simple.

Professional.

One appropriate follow-up later may also be reasonable.

Do not chase indefinitely.

SALES CONVERSATION REVIEW

After each consultation, ask:

Did I listen more than I talked?

☐ Yes ☐ No

Did I understand the actual problem?

☐ Yes ☐ No

Did I explain only what was relevant?

☐ Yes ☐ No

Did I state the price clearly?

☐ Yes ☐ No

Did I pressure the client?

☐ Yes ☐ No

Did I respect their decision?

☐ Yes ☐ No

What did I learn?

Do this after your first ten consultations. Your confidence will improve quickly.

STEP SEVEN ACTION CHECKLIST

- ☐ I understand that selling is about fit, not pressure.
- ☐ I have a simple consultation structure.
- ☐ I know the questions I want to ask.
- ☐ I can explain my offer in relation to the client's problem.
- ☐ I can state my price without apologising.
- ☐ I know how I will handle common concerns professionally.
- ☐ I will respect a no.
- ☐ I will review each conversation and learn from it.

At this point, you have built almost the entire commercial foundation of your intuitive coaching practice.

You know:

who you want to help,

what you want to offer,

what you may charge,

how to explain it,

how people can discover you,

and how an interested person can become a client.

The final step is turning all of this into a practical plan.

Not someday.

Over the next 90 days.

That is where we go next.

STEP EIGHT: YOUR 90-DAY PRACTICE LAUNCH PLAN

You now have the foundations.

You have considered:

who you want to help,

what problem you want to help them with,

what your coaching offer could look like,

how you might price it,

how to explain what you do,

where your first clients may come from,

and how to turn an enquiry into a professional coaching conversation.

Now comes the part that matters most.

Doing it.

It is very easy to leave a course feeling inspired.

You have pages of notes.

New ideas.

New possibilities.

Perhaps greater confidence.

You tell yourself:

“I'm definitely going to do something with this.”

Then ordinary life returns.

Monday arrives.

There are emails.

Work.

Family.

Appointments.

Responsibilities.

A week passes.

Then another.

The notebook gets put somewhere safe.

And gradually the energy disappears.

This section exists to prevent that.

You do not need to build the finished version of your coaching business immediately.

You need to create movement.

So we are going to concentrate on one period:

THE NEXT 90 DAYS

Not the next five years.

Not your eventual coaching empire.

Not the perfect website.

Not everything you might one day create.

Just the next 90 days.

Why 90 Days?

Ninety days is long enough to achieve something meaningful.

But short enough to create urgency.

During 90 focused days, you could:

finalise your first offer, sign your first coaching clients, run an introductory workshop, build referral relationships,

start an email list,
generate meaningful revenue,
test your positioning, and discover what the market actually responds to.

You do not need everything to work.

You need to start collecting evidence.

That is one of the biggest changes you can make as a business owner.

Move from:

“I wonder whether this will work.”

to:

“Let's test it and find out.”

Choose One 90-Day Objective

Your plan needs one primary objective.

Not ten.

One.

Examples might include:

Sign my first five Axiom coaching clients.

Or:

Generate £3,000 from my new coaching programme.

Or:

Launch and fill my first six-person coaching group.

Or:

Run three introductory workshops and generate ten qualified coaching enquiries.

Choose an objective that represents meaningful progress from where you are now.

MY 90-DAY OBJECTIVE

Over the next 90 days, I will:

I will know I have achieved this because:

This matters to me because:

The main thing that could prevent me doing it is:

The behaviour I will need to change is:

Keep this objective visible.

It becomes the filter for the next three months.

Whenever another idea appears, ask:

“Does this help me achieve my 90-day objective?”

If not, it may need to wait.

DAYS 1-30: BUILD

The first month is about creating the minimum foundations required to start offering your coaching professionally.

The emphasis is:

clarity rather than perfection.

By the end of Day 30, someone should be able to:

discover what you do, understand your offer,

understand how to work with you,

and contact you.

That is enough to begin.

WEEK ONE - FINALISE YOUR CLIENT

Return to Step Two.

Decide who you are going to focus on for the next 90 days.

Do not keep changing this every three days.

Test something.

Complete:

For the next 90 days, I am primarily helping:

They are struggling with:

They want:

The moment that may cause them to seek help is:

The language they might use is:

Your positioning can evolve later.

For now, choose.

WEEK TWO - FINALISE YOUR OFFER

Return to Step Three.

Decide:

the programme,

the duration,

the number of sessions,

the outcome,

how Axiom fits,

whether tarot is included, and what the client receives.

Then stop adding things.

You do not need another bonus.

You do not need twelve PDFs.

You do not need three additional sessions to make it feel valuable.

Create the simplest version capable of delivering excellent work.

My programme is:

It lasts:

It includes:

The investment is:

£ _____

The client begins here:

I help them move towards:

Now you have something to sell.

WEEK THREE - CREATE THE CLIENT PATH

You do not necessarily need an elaborate website.

You do need a way for someone to move from:

INTEREST

to

ENQUIRY

to

CONVERSATION

to

CLIENT.

Decide how this will work.

For example:

Someone sees your content.

↓

They visit a simple programme page.

↓

They complete an enquiry form.

↓

You arrange a consultation.

↓

You establish fit.

↓

They decide whether to enrol.

↓

They receive payment information and terms.

They begin.

Your system may be different.

It simply needs to be clear.

MY CLIENT PATH

People discover me through:

↓

They learn more at:

↓

They enquire by:

↓

We then:

↓

If we decide to work together:

↓

The client begins by:

If any part of that journey currently does not exist, build it.

WEEK FOUR - PUT THE PROFESSIONAL BASICS IN PLACE

Before taking paying clients, make sure the basic administration of your practice is appropriate.

Depending on where you live and how you operate, this may include considering:

business registration requirements,

appropriate insurance, professional terms and conditions, privacy and data handling,

payment arrangements,

cancellation policies, record keeping,

invoicing,

client agreements, and appropriate accounting or tax advice.

Requirements vary by location and circumstance, so obtain appropriate professional guidance where needed.

The important principle is simple:

Do not treat the business side casually simply because the work is intuitive.

Professional coaching requires professional foundations.

MY PRACTICE BASICS

- ☐ I have decided how clients will pay.
- ☐ I have clear cancellation/rescheduling terms.
- ☐ I have considered appropriate client terms or agreements.
- ☐ I understand how I will handle client information.
- ☐ I have considered relevant insurance requirements.
- ☐ I have checked appropriate business/tax requirements.
- ☐ I have a simple onboarding process.
- ☐ I know how clients will book sessions.

The professional issue I still need to investigate is:

I will do this by:

YOUR FIRST 30-DAY TARGET

By Day 30, aim to be able to say:

“My coaching practice is ready to accept a client.”

Not perfect.

Ready.

That is a significant distinction.

DAYS 31–60: BECOME VISIBLE

You have built the foundations.

Now people need to know you exist.

This is where some practitioners retreat.

Building the programme felt comfortable.

Writing the website felt comfortable.

Planning felt comfortable.

Visibility feels different.

Because now other people can respond.

They might be interested.

They might not.

They might buy.

They might say no.

They might ignore you entirely.

That uncertainty is part of business.

You cannot build a thriving practice while remaining invisible.

WEEK FIVE - TELL PEOPLE WHAT YOU DO

Start with the people already connected to you.

This might include:

previous clients,
email subscribers,
professional contacts, relevant friends and colleagues,
social media followers,
workshop participants, and existing communities.

Tell them clearly that your work has developed.

You do not need to pretend you have been running the programme for ten years.

You can simply say what you are now offering.

For example:

“I am now offering a structured intuitive coaching programme for people navigating major life and career transitions. The work uses the Axiom coaching framework and can incorporate tarot where it genuinely supports the process. I am opening a small number of places over the next three months.”

Then explain who it is for and how to learn more.

You have now made the offer real.

MY ANNOUNCEMENT

Write the core message you will use:

I will share this with:

I will do this on:

Put a date against it.

WEEK SIX - CREATE USEFUL CONTENT

Choose one question your ideal client is already asking.

Teach something useful about it.

For example:

If your client struggles with major decisions:

Why asking more people for advice can sometimes make a difficult decision harder.

If your client struggles with confidence:

Why waiting to feel confident before acting can keep you stuck.

If your client is navigating change:

Why knowing what you don't want is not the same as knowing what you want next.

Your content should allow someone to think:

"This person understands what I am experiencing."

That is more valuable than simply trying to appear inspirational.

MY NEXT FOUR CONTENT PIECES

WEEK ONE

WEEK TWO

WEEK THREE

WEEK FOUR

At the end of appropriate content, include an invitation.

Tell people that you work with clients on this issue.

WEEK SEVEN - BUILD RELATIONSHIPS

Choose five people or organisations whose audience overlaps with yours.

Contact them.

Do not begin by asking them to promote you.

Begin with relationship and contribution.

You might say:

“I work with people navigating major career transitions and noticed that your community focuses heavily on professional development. I wondered whether a practical session on intuition, decision-making and career change might be useful for your audience.”

You are creating a reason to have a conversation.

MY FIVE RELATIONSHIP ACTIONS

1. _____
2. _____
3. _____
4. _____
5. _____

I will complete these by:

WEEK EIGHT - CREATE AN EXPERIENCE

If appropriate for your practice, run something.

A workshop.

A masterclass.

A talk.

An introductory session.

An online event.

Do not wait until you can attract 100 people.

Five appropriate people can be enough to begin.

The purpose is to let people experience your thinking.

Teach something useful.

Then make an appropriate invitation.

For example:

“If today's session has helped you recognise that this is something you would like to explore more deeply, I offer a structured coaching programme specifically for this. I will explain how you can find out more before we finish.”

No pressure.

Just an invitation.

MY FIRST EXPERIENCE

I will run:

For:

On:

The subject will be:

I would like approximately:

_____ participants.

At the end, I will invite interested participants to:

Now it has a date.

YOUR DAY 60 CHECKPOINT

At Day 60, review:

How many people have I spoken to about my offer?

How many enquiries have I received?

How many consultations have I held?

How many clients have enrolled?

How much revenue has the programme generated?

£_____

Where did the enquiries come from?

What seems to be working?

What am I avoiding?

That final question can be particularly revealing.

DAYS 61–90: SELL, DELIVER AND REFINE

The final 30 days are about evidence.

You have built.

You have become visible.

Now pay attention to what actually happens.

Not what you hoped would happen.

Not what you feared would happen.

What happens.

This is where the business begins teaching you.

WEEK NINE - HAVE REAL CONVERSATIONS

Your objective now is to create opportunities for appropriate sales conversations.

Do not measure success solely by whether someone buys.

Initially, conversations themselves create valuable information.

You may discover:

people misunderstand the offer,

a particular part excites them,

the programme duration feels right,

the programme duration feels too long,

the price creates questions,
your language is unclear,
or a different client group responds more strongly.
Listen.

YOUR CONSULTATION TARGET

During the next 30 days, I aim to hold:

_____ qualified consultations.

To create those opportunities, I will:

WEEK TEN - FOLLOW UP

Review every genuine enquiry.

Did you respond?

Did you make the next step clear?

Did you follow up where appropriate?

Do not assume:

“They didn't reply, so they aren't interested.”

People become distracted.

A simple follow-up may be enough:

“I wanted to check whether you had any questions about the programme after our conversation.”

Then allow them to decide.

MY FOLLOW-UP LIST

Person / enquiry:

Next action:

Date:

Repeat as necessary.

Keep this simple.

WEEK ELEVEN - DELIVER EXCELLENT WORK

If clients have enrolled, your attention now shifts to delivery.

This is important.

Do not become so focused on finding the next client that you neglect the person who has already trusted you.

Your early clients can become:

your strongest learning,

your strongest advocates,

your first referrals, and, where appropriate and with permission, sources of valuable feedback or testimonials.

Deliver well.

Listen carefully.

Notice what works.

Do not try to impress them with Axiom.

Use Axiom to help them.

There is a difference.

AFTER EACH CLIENT SESSION

Ask yourself:

What seemed most useful?

What changed during the conversation?

Where did the client become stuck?

Did I use tarot?

☐ Yes ☐ No

If yes, what did it genuinely add?

What is the client doing next?

What am I learning about my programme?

This is how your offer improves.

WEEK TWELVE - REVIEW THE EVIDENCE

At the end of the 90 days, stop.

Review.

Do not immediately rush into creating something new.

Ask:

What did these 90 days teach me?

YOUR 90-DAY BUSINESS REVIEW

My original objective was:

I achieved:

- ☐ All of it
- ☐ Most of it
- ☐ Some of it
- ☐ Very little of it

Qualified enquiries:

Consultations:

New clients:

Coaching revenue:

£_____

Workshops/events delivered:

New professional relationships:

The strongest source of clients was:

The message that seemed to resonate most was:

The most common question or objection was:

The strongest part of my offer was:

The weakest part was:

What surprised me?

What did I avoid?

What did I learn about my clients?

What did I learn about myself?

DO MORE OF WHAT WORKS

Suppose your first workshop generates:

twelve attendees,

four consultations,

and two clients.

Do not immediately decide you need a podcast.

Run the workshop again.

Improve it.

Suppose referrals generate three excellent clients.

Develop more referral relationships.

Suppose one piece of content generates several enquiries.

Explore that subject further.

Successful businesses frequently become stronger by repeating what works rather than constantly inventing something new.

STOP WHAT DOES NOT WORK

The opposite also matters.

Perhaps you spent ten hours each week creating social media content and generated no meaningful conversations.

That does not automatically mean social media cannot work.

But it does mean you should investigate.

Was the audience wrong?

Was the message unclear?

Was there no invitation?

Were you creating engagement rather than authority?

Was the platform inappropriate?

Do not continue an activity indefinitely simply because somebody told you:

“You have to be on social media.”

Evidence matters.

DO NOT CHANGE EVERYTHING AT ONCE

If something does not work, resist the urge to change:

your niche,
your programme,
your price,
your branding,
your website,
your platform,
and your message
all at once.

If you change everything, you learn very little.

Make thoughtful adjustments.

Then test again.

Business development is an ongoing process of:

ACTION

↓

EVIDENCE

↓

REFLECTION

↓

ADJUSTMENT

ACTION

That process should feel familiar.

YOUR SIMPLE BUSINESS DASHBOARD

You do not need complicated software.

Track a few useful numbers.

THE WEEKLY 20-MINUTE BUSINESS REVIEW

Once a week, answer five questions.

1. What did I do this week to create clients?

2. What happened as a result?

3. What did I learn?

4. What am I avoiding?

5. What are the three most important actions next week?

1. _____
2. _____
3. _____

Twenty minutes.

Every week.

This single habit can prevent months of unfocused activity.

DO NOT CONFUSE PREPARATION WITH PROGRESS

This deserves repeating.

You can spend the next 90 days:

changing your logo,

choosing fonts,

redesigning your website,

creating Canva templates, researching microphones,

watching marketing videos, planning a podcast,

buying more courses, and reorganising your office.

At the end, you may still have no clients.

Ask:

“Does this activity directly help me create, sell or improve the coaching practice?”

Sometimes the answer will be yes.

Often it will be no.

Learn the difference.

THE MINIMUM VIABLE PRACTICE

At the beginning, you need surprisingly little.

You need:

a clear client,

a meaningful problem,

a professional offer,

a sensible price,

a way to explain it,

a way to find people,

a way to enrol them,

And the ability to deliver good coaching.

Everything else can develop.

You do not need to look like an established corporation before you serve your first client.

You need to behave like a professional.

YOUR 90-DAY COMMITMENT

Complete this before leaving the course.

For the next 90 days, my primary business objective is:

The coaching offer I am going to focus on is:

The people I am going to help are:

My starting price is:

£_____

My two primary routes to clients are:

1. _____
2. _____

The activity I will repeat every week is:

The distraction I will stop using as an excuse is:

At the end of 90 days, I want to have created:

Sign it.

90-day review date:

MY NEXT THREE ACTIONS

There is one final exercise.

Do not leave the course with twenty-seven actions.

Choose three.

WITHIN 48 HOURS

I will:

WITHIN 7 DAYS

I will:

WITHIN 30 DAYS

I will:

These actions should be specific.

Not:

“Work on my business.”

Instead:

“Write the first version of my coaching offer.”

Not:

“Do some marketing.”

Instead:

“Contact five previous clients and tell them about the new programme.”

Not:

“Sort out my website.”

Instead:

“Publish one page explaining my coaching programme and how to enquire.”

Specific action creates movement.

YOUR FIRST CLIENT

There is something worth remembering as you begin.

You do not need fifty clients.

You need the first one.

Then another.

Your first client gives you experience.

Your first programme gives you evidence.

Your first consultation teaches you about selling.

Your first workshop teaches you about presenting.

Your first no teaches you that rejection is survivable.

Your first referral teaches you the value of excellent work.

Your first £1,000 teaches you that an idea can become revenue.

The business becomes real through accumulation.

Do not dismiss small beginnings.

CONFIDENCE WILL NOT ALWAYS COME FIRST

You may leave this course feeling confident.

You may also leave thinking:

“Can I really do this?”

Both responses are normal.

Do not make confidence a prerequisite for action.

Sometimes the sequence is:

ACTION

EXPERIENCE

EVIDENCE

CONFIDENCE

You make the offer before you feel completely ready.

Someone says yes.

You coach them.

You discover that you can do the work.

You improve.

Then confidence grows.

Waiting until you feel completely confident may mean waiting indefinitely.

YOUR BUSINESS IS ANOTHER AXIOM JOURNEY

There is an interesting way to think about the next 90 days.

You can apply the same principles to yourself.

AWARENESS

What is the reality of my business now?

ACTIVATION

What do I need to start doing?

CALIBRATION

What needs adjusting once I have evidence?

EXPANSION

What opportunities become possible when something starts working?

EMBODIMENT

Which business behaviours need to become consistent?

IDENTITY

Who am I becoming through building this practice?

Perhaps:

a coach.

A practitioner.

A business owner.

A specialist.

A teacher.

A methodology practitioner.

Someone who is willing to be visible.

Someone who can charge professionally.

Someone who can make an offer without apology.

Someone who follows through.

That final identity may be more important than you realise.

A FINAL MESSAGE FROM RICHARD

When I developed Axiom, I did not want to create another system that simply produced interesting conversations.

I wanted to create an approach that moved beyond insight.

Because insight can be powerful.

A tarot card can reveal something.

A question can change perspective.

An intuitive impression can open an unexpected door.

A coaching conversation can create extraordinary clarity.

But eventually something has to happen outside the conversation.

The client has to live differently.

And the same principle applies to you.

You can leave this course with:

a certificate,

a workbook,

new knowledge,

new skills,

and new ideas.

But none of those things will build your practice for you.

At some point you have to tell somebody what you do.

You have to create the offer.

You have to decide the price.

You have to become visible.

You have to invite someone to work with you.

You have to risk hearing no.

And you have to be ready when someone says yes.

That is where your development as a professional practitioner enters another stage.

You are no longer simply learning the work.

You are taking responsibility for bringing that work into the world.

Do not believe that you need to build everything immediately.

You don't.

Start with one person you can genuinely help.

One problem you understand.

One clear offer.

One professional price.

One way of finding clients.

One invitation.

Then deliver the work exceptionally well.

Learn.

Refine.

Repeat.

Your practice will teach you things no business book can teach you.

Your clients will teach you.

Your mistakes will teach you.

Your successes will teach you.

The conversations that do not convert will teach you.

The offers that work will teach you.

And over time, you will begin developing something that is uniquely yours.

Axiom provides a framework.

It does not ask you to become a copy of me.

Your experience, expertise, personality, intuition, interests and clients will shape the way you ultimately bring the work into the world.

That is exactly as it should be.

So as you finish these pages, there is only one question I want you to answer:

What are you going to do next?

Write it down.

Put a date against it.

Then do it.

Because the principle that sits at the heart of Axiom applies just as powerfully to building your practice:

Insight is not transformation.

Your business changes when what you know becomes what you do.

CONCLUSION: FROM LEARNING TO PRACTICE

You began this guide with an idea.

Perhaps you could take what you have learned through Axiom and build something from it.

Perhaps intuitive coaching could become part of your existing work.

Perhaps it could develop into a part-time practice.

Perhaps, eventually, it could become your profession.

At the beginning, that possibility may have felt exciting but vague.

Now it should feel more tangible.

You have begun answering the questions that turn an idea into a practice:

Who do I want to help?

What do I want to help them with?

What transformation can I support?

What will I offer?

How will I structure it?

What will I charge?

How will I explain what I do?

How will people find me?

How will I turn interest into clients?

And what am I going to do during the next 90 days?

Those questions matter because a successful practice is rarely created by one dramatic decision.

It is created through a series of smaller decisions followed by consistent action.

You Do Not Need to Have Everything Worked Out

There can be enormous pressure when starting something new to get everything right.

The perfect niche.

The perfect programme.

The perfect price.

The perfect website.

The perfect message.

The perfect launch.

But your first version is unlikely to be your final version.

Nor should it be.

Your practice will evolve as you work with real people.

You will discover which clients you most enjoy helping.

You will notice which problems repeatedly appear.

You will learn which parts of your offer create the greatest value.

You will become better at explaining what you do.

Your pricing will develop.

Your confidence will develop.

Your reputation will develop.

And your understanding of your own work will deepen.

You do not need certainty about the entire journey before taking the first step.

You need enough clarity to begin.

Build the Practice Before You Build the Empire

It is easy to become distracted by what your business might eventually become.

Courses.

Books.

Memberships.

Retreats.

Large audiences.

Training programmes.

Multiple income streams.

Perhaps some of those things will become part of your future.

But they are not where you need to begin.

Begin with the practice.

Begin with becoming very good at helping a particular kind of person with a meaningful problem.

Find clients.

Coach them.

Listen.

Learn.

Refine the work.

Develop evidence.

Build trust.

Create results you can stand behind.

Then grow from something real.

A strong business is much easier to expand when its foundations have already been proven.

Beyond the Cards

One of the opportunities Axiom creates is the ability to think differently about what an intuitive practitioner can become.

Tarot may have been where your journey started.

It may remain an important part of your work.

For some practitioners, it will remain central.

For others, it will become one tool within a much broader coaching practice.

And some may increasingly work without cards at all.

None of these directions is inherently better than another.

What matters is understanding that your value does not exist solely in your ability to interpret cards.

Your value also exists in your ability to:

listen,

question,

recognise patterns,

challenge appropriately,

create perspective,

work with intuition, facilitate reflection,

support decision-making,

encourage action,

and help another person move from awareness towards meaningful change.

That is a much larger professional identity.

Axiom gives you an approach for working within that territory.

What you build around it is yours.

A Practice Built Around Responsibility

As your confidence grows, remember what professional intuitive coaching is not.

It is not about becoming the person who has all the answers.

It is not about making people's decisions for them.

It is not about creating dependency.

And it is not about using intuition as unquestionable authority.

The strongest practitioner is not necessarily the one who appears most certain.

It is the practitioner who can create a space in which the client becomes more capable of understanding themselves, making choices and taking responsibility for what comes next.

That principle matters professionally.

It also matters commercially.

Because the reputation you build will eventually become one of your most valuable business assets.

What do people say after working with you?

How do they describe the experience?

Do they trust you?

Would they return?

Would they recommend you?

Would another professional feel confident referring someone to you?

That is how sustainable practices are built.

Not simply through marketing.

Through the quality of the work behind the marketing.

Your First 90 Days Are an Experiment

You now have a plan.

Treat it as an experiment rather than an examination.

You are not being tested.

You are gathering information.

Make an offer.

See what happens.

Have conversations.

Listen carefully.

Run the workshop.

Publish the content.

Approach the partner.

Ask for the referral.

State the price.

Work with clients.

Then examine the evidence.

Some things will work.

Some will not.

Some will work differently from how you expected.

That is business.

Do not interpret every disappointing result as failure.

Ask instead:

What is this teaching me?

Then adjust.

That is how your practice becomes stronger.

The Business Owner You Are Becoming

Perhaps the most significant change ahead has very little to do with marketing.

It is an identity change.

There is a difference between thinking:

“I would like to have a coaching practice.”

and thinking:

“I run a coaching practice.”

The second requires different behaviour.

A business owner makes decisions.

A business owner looks at numbers.

A business owner follows up.

A business owner protects time.

A business owner communicates value.

A business owner makes offers.

A business owner notices what works and stops doing what does not.

A business owner understands that serving clients and generating revenue are not opposing ideas.

Your practice needs both.

Without meaningful client work, there is little purpose to the business.

Without sufficient revenue, there may eventually be no business through which to deliver the work.

A thriving practice holds both.

Transformation and sustainability.

Intuition and structure.

Service and commerce.

Purpose and professionalism.

You do not have to choose between them.

Keep It Simple

When you are uncertain what to do next, return to the foundations.

Who am I helping?

What do they need?

What am I offering?

How will they find me?

What am I asking them to do next?

Am I delivering work worth recommending?

Those questions can take you a surprisingly long way.

You can add complexity later.

For now, simplicity is an advantage.

The Next Step Is Yours

This guide cannot build your practice.

Neither can the Axiom course.

They can give you:

knowledge, structure,

tools,

questions,

ideas,

and a direction.

But eventually responsibility passes to you.

There will be a point when another worksheet will not help.

Another business video will not help.

Another hour thinking about your website will not help.

You will simply need to act.

Send the message.

Announce the programme.

Contact the potential partner.

Book the venue.

Run the workshop.

Invite the client.

Have the conversation.

Say the price.

Coach the person.

Then learn from what happens.

You do not need to know exactly where this will lead.

You simply need to begin creating evidence that the practice you imagined can exist outside your imagination.

One action becomes a conversation.

One conversation becomes an enquiry.

One enquiry becomes a client.

One client becomes experience.

Experience becomes confidence.

Confidence creates further action.

And gradually, what once felt like an idea starts becoming a business.

One Final Question

Before you close this guide, return to the three commitments you have already made:

Within 48 hours.

Within seven days.

Within 30 days.

Look at the first one.

That is where your practice begins.

Not when the website is perfect.

Not when you feel completely confident.

Not when you know everything.

It begins when you act.

Axiom is built around movement from awareness and insight towards meaningful change.

Building your practice requires exactly the same thing.

So take what you now know and make it tangible.

Build something useful.

Serve people well.

Charge professionally.

Learn constantly.

Protect the integrity of your work.

And allow the practice to develop as you develop.

Because ultimately, the success of your business will not be determined by how many ideas you leave this course with.

It will be determined by what you do with them.

Insight is not transformation.

The next stage begins when insight becomes action.
